July 6, 2017

Policy and progress in the Arctic: Essays by students in the Jackson School’s International Policy Institute

Peter Kelley
UW News

Graduate student fellows with the International Policy Institute in the University of Washington Jackson School of International Studies have begun publishing a 13-part series of blogs exploring aspects of the intergovernmental Arctic Council as a 21st-century institution.

The blog series began publication July 5 and will continue through Sept. 7 at the World Policy Institute’s Arctic in Context website. The first of the student pieces, by Brandon Ray, has been published.

Kicking off the series was a piece by Nadine Fabbi, managing director of the UW Canadian Studies Center and lead for the Arctic Fellows Initiative in the Jackson School, with Jackson School lecturer Scott Montgomery and independent scholar Eric Finke, on “The Arctic Council: A Unique Institution in 21st-Century International Relations.”

Essays by fellows in the International Policy Institute and their topics and dates are as follows.

July 6: “Is the Arctic Council Still a Visionary Leader?” by Brandon Ray

July 10: “Is the U.S. Ready for an Arctic Oil Spill?” by Valerie Cleland

July 24: “Protecting the Polar Seaways,” by David Rivera

July 26: “The Ripple Effect — Downstream of the 66th Parallel,” by Elena S. Bell

Aug. 2: “Breaking the Ice for Indigenous Voices on the World Stage,” by Malina Dumas
Aug. 7: “No PAME No Gain for Indigenous Groups,” by Steven Fry
Aug. 9: “Ships and Ice Don’t Mix,” by Ian Scott Hanna
Aug. 30: “#SomethingHasToBeSaid: Angry Inuk’s Direct Yet Gentle Crusade,” by Lucy Kruesel
Sept. 6: “Who Needs the Arctic Council Anyhow? Quebec’s Arctic Leadership,” by Amy M. Delo
Sept. 7: “Asian Tiger Meets the Polar Bear,” by Jay-Kwon Park

The Jackson School’s International Policy Institute is funded by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, with the mission of better connecting higher education research and expertise with the policy world in the area of global affairs.