This course addresses the unique set of challenges confronting the newly independent nations of former Soviet Central Asia that are attempting a historic change towards establishing sovereign market-based economies over their legacy of socialist rule. They are simultaneously converting from socialist to market-oriented economies and undertaking the same development struggles as other low-income countries. The course will first discuss the salient features of the economies of Central Asia during the period of socialist rule in the former Soviet Union. It will then examine the process of transition as it applies to the region and contrast what ideally should happen with what actually has happened. The course then examines aspects of their struggle for economic development in the context of current debates over “globalization”. Students will apply basic tools of economic analysis to highly applied policy issues. Starting from a common socialist heritage, the nations of Central Asia are following distinctly different paths and thus provide a remarkable opportunity for students to examine how economic development occurs.

This course offers some key content knowledge about the Middle East through PERSIA (Politics, Economics, Religion, Social, Intellectual, Arts). It also incorporates effective teaching methods (Socratic dialogue, Inquiry, Structured Academic Controversy, Take A Stand, Concept Attainment, and Deliberation) designed to examine and discuss controversial issues, within the framework of democratic education. The framework for issues selected is guided by Kelly’s (1986) “best-case, fair hearing of competing points of view” (p. 368) that should provide for a rich spectrum of ideas on a given issue under examination. In addition, we will use the concepts of “grievance,” “discourse,” “perversity,” “futility,” “jeopardy,” “identity,” “enlightened political engagement,” “explicit, implicit, and null curriculum” to look at the Middle East.

This course will investigate the themes of orthodoxy, heresy, and religious coercion in the formation of the Christian tradition from the preaching of Paul of Tarsus to the episcopacy of Augustine of Hippo (395-431 C.E.). During this four-hundred-year period, Christianity evolved from being a small, sectarian branch of Judaism to become the most successful religious movement of the ancient world. At every stage of this development, there were struggles to define and enforce particular forms of Christianity as definitively “orthodox.” The conversion of the emperor Constantine added a further element, but associating orthodoxy with the power of the late Roman state—a development that would have profound implications for the later history of medieval Europe, Byzantium, and the Middle East. We will study this critical formative period in the history of Christianity from the perspective of both the “winners” and the “losers.” On the one hand, we will examine the arguments and rhetorical strategies of the New Testament and Patristic writers, whose works became canonical in the dominant Christian tradition; by the end of the course, we should be able to define the primary ideologies and mechanisms used by the intellectual and political leaders of the “orthodox” church to suppress “heretical” teaching. On the other hand, we will attempt to understand the teaching and social contexts of these various “heretical” groups—such as “Marcionites,” Gnostics,” and “Arians”—so vigorously condemned by their “orthodox” opponents. Ironically, it is precisely these polemics that provide modern historians with the necessary material to reconstruct the various “alternative” versions of Christian doctrine. Rather than surveying the history of every schism in the early church, we will concentrate on four important episodes or phases in the construction of Christian orthodoxy: 1) the emergence of Christianity out of Judaism during the mid-first to early second century CE, with special focus on Paul and divergent Pauline school traditions; 2) the conflict surrounding “Gnostic” and Marcionite movements in the second and third centuries; 3) the Council of Nicaea and the Arian controversies in the late third and early fourth centuries; 4) Augustine’s confrontation with Manichaeism and the Donatist conflict in late Roman North Africa.

This is a survey course designed to give a historical understanding of social, cultural, and political developments in the Middle East in the 19th and 20th centuries. Within a general political framework, the course will cover social, economic, and intellectual currents of these two centuries, in order to provide a historical context to the events and realities of life in the region today. Topics to be covered include the decline of the Ottoman Empire, the rise of British and French colonialism, 20th century nationalist movements, and the origins of more recent developments, including the Arab-Israeli conflict, the resurgence of Islam, and American involvement in the region. Throughout the course we will examine how broader developments affected the lives of individuals and social groups, including (but not limited to) women, workers, peasants, and religious or ethnic minorities.

With today's intense media focus on the war in Iraq, the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, and "Islamic Militancy," the West has come to view the Middle East and its people almost exclusively through the prisms of politics and religion. This course, however, will survey the historical impact of both non-official and non-elite culture—"popular culture"—on the ways in which the people of the region have understood both their own identities and their place in the broader global context. Beginning with the rise of the mass media in the region, we will survey both the form and reception of popular culture in the region, and discuss the ways in which things like coffeehouses, newspapers, music, film, comic strips, television, and popular literature have contributed to the beliefs, practices, and identifications of various communities in the region. Although examples will taken from throughout the region, the course will focus most closely on examples drawn from the Arabic-speaking world.

ISLAMIC IDENTITY IN MODERN SOUTH ASIA
This class focuses on the development of a Modern Islamic identity in South Asia (India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh) from the last days of the Mughal Empire to the current period. Two important themes include 1) understanding the development of South Asian Islam in relationship to global developments including colonialism, Islamic reform movements, and pan-Islamism during the modern period and, 2) tracing the continuities and changes of older South Asian Islamic traditions in popular culture, literature, and politics.

This class will also emphasize historical methodology by focusing on how historical information is gathered, analyzed, and reproduced. Thus, as we examine the history of South Asia, we will also focus on the historiography that has shaped the ways in which historical narratives of South Asia are created, and more specifically how this has impacted the development of Islamic identities in South Asia.

This course takes seriously the cultural factors that create the preferences, biases, behaviors, moral forms that shape and guide everyday thinking and behaving. The course will introduce students to the ways scientific knowledge (whether humanistic, social or scientific) always assumes a personal basis. We first understand our own cultural constructions that shape our perspectives and then expand and make a more sophisticated analysis of global cultures using reflexive sociology and anthropology. We tackle social and cultural interactions on a comparative basis on the topic of culture and violence.
We focus on violence as it relates to race, gender, class, war and everyday life; ending with a section on violence and religion. Violence is the theme of the course in the sense that violence or forms of coercion are one of the fundamental ways culture is created, maintained and destroyed—whether in developed or less developed societies. It is also helps to show us how to deconstruct our cultural and social worlds in order to understand, explain and even to change them. In this sense, cultural analysis is a moral enterprise in that we recognize our own moral suppositions—reconstruct and develop new ones, and then use them to judge culture and if necessary, to change it based on a sense of what is needed and wanted.

This course covers fascinating and controversial global issues relating to interactions between political power (e.g., governments, legislatures, and courts), on the one hand, and the rule of law on the other hand. We will address issues at the domestic level, the international level, and through comparative analysis. Among the issues to be studied: theories of law and political power; how the concept and practices of ‘rule of law’ have developed from antiquity to modernity; how civil democratic supervision has developed and what are its boundaries; the nature of political corruption and how to fight it; how economics affects law and what the interactions are between economic globalization and the rule of law; the relationships between judges/justices and politicians; warfare and human rights; terrorism, counter-terrorism and human rights; how law may assist and how it may hinder efforts to gain social equality; etc.

We often treat fundamental human rights and freedoms as “universal” values that are potentially shared by all nations across the world. However, the universality of these rights and freedoms has long been contested by various cultural and religious traditions since 1948. The critics argue that the so-called “universal” rights and freedoms are cultural construction of the West and firmly based on Judeo-Christian traditions and values. For example, such rights and freedoms as gender equality, freedom of expression or freedom of religion are often rejected or interpreted differently by various religious and cultural systems around the world. Moreover, religion plays a critical role in treatment of human rights not only in non-secular but also in the so-called secular regimes. Therefore, an international standard of human rights and liberties cannot be achieved without carefully analyzing the influence of religion on conceptualization of rights and freedoms in different traditions. Hence, embracing a culturally sensitive approach, this course aims to examine differing discourses of human rights across major religious traditions (Christianity, Judaism, Islam, Hinduism), and highlight some of their similarities and differences from a comparative perspective. The course material will provide a balanced view of the theological sources and their practical implications by re-reading some of the original religious texts and analyzing court cases from various countries in Asia, Africa, the Middle East, North America, and Latin America.

This course introduces students to the major theoretical approaches to international relations—Realism, Liberalism, and Marxism—and uses these approaches to address a variety of issues. For example, we will discuss the rise of the modern state system, the origins of WWI, the Cold War, the Gulf Wars, terrorism, genocide in Rwanda, free trade, North-South relations, the environment, and human rights. The principle aims of the course are to demonstrate how theory influences our explanations; to familiarize students with some important issues in international politics; and most important, to help students evaluate contemporary issues in international politics.
Description: War is a central feature of international politics. The course begins with a review of the development of modern warfare and its relationship to political, economic, and social factors. The focus of the course is on the causes of war. Is war inevitable given the structure of the international system, or can, for example, changes in beliefs or the spread of democracies temper aggressive appetites? We will examine these questions by focusing on World War I, World War II, and the two recent wars in the Gulf. The course concludes with a discussion of the ethics of war.

Focusing on recent analysis of Muslim civil society and the Islamic public sphere, this course examines political Islam as a phenomenon produced at the intersection of universalistic and particularistic political cultures and in the spaces between political, religious, and social authority. The first part of the course examines the terms of analysis that social scientists employ to discuss ‘political Islam’ and ‘Islamic fundamentalism’. Students will examine the relationship between different forms of authority in Muslim societies and categories of Islamic political movements. The second part of the course will examine how different publics produce moral judgments about political practices focusing on anthropological case studies from South Asia, South East Asia, and the Middle East.
